

My Truth and Reconciliation Philosophy

Students will be taught many different important values within my classroom; one being the importance of generosity. Students will learn that generosity is not just giving materialistic things, there are many things they can do as young people to show generosity to the people around them. I will also display this value by generously giving my time to all my students.

From the moment students walk into my classroom, they will know it is a place of respect and belonging. Students will be taught the importance of inclusion and acceptance of others and expected to act in ways that are true to that belief. Students of all backgrounds will know they belong in the classroom

Students will learn to think for themselves and know what their own strengths are. I want students to be able to work independently and be able to problem solve without being told everything. Students will develop the skills they need in order to make good decisions for themselves and know how they learn best. I want students to find a passion for learning and be able to follow their interests.

I want to give students the confidence and skills they need to successfully accomplish anything they want to in their lives. Students will be encouraged to try and learn new things; they will face challenges with determination and when faced with failure they will have the skills and perseverance to try again.
